

Week 10 - Close to breakeven with cash on the side

Week ending 11 May 2026

Snapshot

Estimated account value	£1,986.69
Invested amount	About £1,765.87
Cash	£220.82
Cash weight	11.12%
Main winners	QQQA, VUAG, ASML and Airbnb
Main drags	Gold, Rheinmetall, Realty Income and Meta

Where the portfolio stood

Week 10 felt like a transition week. The account was sitting just below the £2,000 area after the Google sale and the latest movements in the remaining holdings. It was not in a bad place, but it was not in the same clean recovery position as Week 7 and Week 8 either.

The important change was that cash had become a meaningful part of the portfolio. I had around £220.82 in cash, or about 11.12% of the account, which gave me dry powder for a possible Google re-entry. That flexibility was useful, but it also meant I had less exposure to one of the strongest large-cap AI names while the market was still rewarding AI-linked businesses.

The strongest and weakest areas

The strongest part of the account was still the broad-market and AI infrastructure sleeve. QQQA, VUAG and ASML were doing most of the work in keeping the portfolio close to breakeven. Airbnb also looked healthier than it had earlier in the period.

The weak spots were gold, Rheinmetall, Realty Income and Meta. Gold was the largest holding and one of the biggest drags, down 9.28%. Rheinmetall was down 25.96%, which made it the clearest percentage loser. Realty Income was still being affected by rates, and Meta was down even though I still liked the business long term.

What I wanted to do next

The main task was not to force trades. I wanted to redeploy cash patiently and keep reviewing each holding against its original role. If Google came back to the right level, I could use the cash. If not, there was no need to rush just because the money was available.

The account had already moved from a difficult low around £1,860, recovered above £2,000, and then settled slightly below it with cash on the side. That still felt disciplined rather than broken.
