

Week 14 - Google back in, ASML profit locked

Portfolio update to Tuesday 9 June 2026

Snapshot

Week 13 account value	Around £2,007
Highest point in Week 14	Around £2,023
Account value at review	Around £1,979.98
Starting value	£1,999
Cash after trades	Around £283.65
Main realised trade	Sold ASML for £40.59 realised profit
Main new buy	Bought Google at $359.90 and added one SGLN share
Pending order	One SpaceX share at $140, not filled yet

A good week that did not end perfectly

Week 14 felt good for most of the week. The account started strong and reached around £2,023, which was the highest point of the week. It then came back down to around £1,979.98 on the working valuation, which was annoying because it put the account slightly below the £1,999 starting value again.

Even so, I do not see the week as bad. I followed through on plans I had already spoken about. I got back into Google around the level I wanted, sold ASML to lock in a strong profit, and added another gold share to increase the hedge. From a discipline point of view, I think the week was positive.

What The Intelligent Investor was changing for me

I was reading The Intelligent Investor and it was definitely affecting the way I thought about the portfolio. The main thing it was teaching me was discipline: protect capital, be patient, and do not get dragged into whatever the market is doing that day.

That was part of why I was happy to take profit in ASML and build up cash. I cannot perfectly call the market, but I did think markets might come down a bit over the next week. I would rather have cash available and a stronger hedge than be fully exposed after a strong run.

The main decisions

The best decision was getting back into Google at around $359.90. I had already said I wanted to buy if it came back towards the $360 to $365 area, and that is what happened. I did not chase it higher. I waited and used the cash when the price came to me.

I also sold ASML to lock in the profit. The position was up around 30%, and the realised profit was £40.59. ASML is still a great company, but I do not think selling a position for a strong gain is something to apologise for. It protected capital and improved the cash position.

I bought one more share of SGLN because gold was down around 14% and I wanted to strengthen the hedge. I did not want to keep buying gold blindly, but one extra share made sense while markets felt stretched.

Where the portfolio stood after the trades

Area	My view after Week 14
Google	Back in at $359.90. This followed the plan.
ASML	Sold fully and locked in £40.59 realised profit.
Gold / SGLN	Added one share for hedge protection and to average down.
Cash	Around £283.65, giving more flexibility.
Meta	Still high quality; no real business concern.
VUAG and QQQA	Still important broad market and Nasdaq exposure.
Rheinmetall	Still needs watching because it has been weak.
Symbotic	Still volatile; automation idea remains interesting.

Realty Income and NextEra	Still rate-sensitive but useful for balance.