

Week 15 - SpaceX and a stronger account

Portfolio update to Tuesday 16 June 2026

Snapshot

Current account value	£2,055.86
Week 14 account value	Around £2,023
Move since Week 14	+£32.86
Starting cost basis	£1,999
Position versus starting value	+£56.86
Return versus starting value	+2.84%
Investments	£1,937.39
Cash balance	£118.47
Cash as % of portfolio	About 5.8%
Main new position	Bought 1 share of SpaceX
Main winner	SpaceX
Main unrealised drags	Gold, Rheinmetall, Meta and Symbotic

A better week for the account

Week 15 was another positive week. The account was sitting at £2,055.86 compared with around £2,023 in Week 14. That means the portfolio improved by about £32.86 and was around £56.86 above the original starting capital of roughly £1,999.

That gave me more breathing room. It did not mean I should become careless, but it did show that the decisions over the last few weeks had helped protect and grow the account.

The SpaceX buy

The biggest development was buying SpaceX. I bought one share because I genuinely believe in the company long term and wanted to get exposure as early as possible. It was still speculative because I knew it could easily fall straight after becoming available, and I was prepared to take a small short-term loss if that happened.

Luckily, the opposite happened. The position was showing around £160 on Trading 212, with the live price around $220 at the latest check, which put it up around 30%+ in the portfolio. That was a very strong start, but I did not want to treat the early profit as guaranteed.

What helped

SpaceX was the biggest help by far. QQQA also continued to work well and was up around £28.59, or roughly 24%. VUAG was up around £23.30, or roughly 11.77%, which is exactly what I want from a broad S&P 500 holding.

Airbnb and Berkshire were also positive, and Alphabet was slightly positive after I re-entered around $360. I was pleased with that because it showed I had waited for the price I wanted instead of chasing.

What still hurt

Gold was still the biggest unrealised cash drag, down around £49.18 or 12.03%. I was less worried about that than I would be with a normal equity holding because gold is there as a hedge, but it was still frustrating.

Rheinmetall was still the biggest percentage loser apart from gold in cash terms, down around £33.05 or 27.70%. I had previously thought about cutting 50% of the position if it reached a 30% loss, but I no longer wanted to force that rule. I still understood the long-term defence thesis and did not want to sell at a weak point just to make the red number disappear.

Meta was down around £15.56 or 6.33%, but I was not worried about Meta as a business. Symbotic was down around £14.65 or 12.58%. I bought more Symbotic deliberately to average down and add to the robotics thesis, but I knew I needed to let the position prove itself rather than keep averaging down blindly.

My main takeaway

The week felt positive, but it also reminded me not to confuse a good short-term move with guaranteed progress. SpaceX had worked very well straight away, but it was still a speculative, volatile position. The account was above the starting point, but some positions were still dragging.

The goal from here was to keep the discipline: protect capital, avoid getting overexcited, and make sure new buys were still backed by a proper reason.