

Week 8 - Holding the recovery

Week ending 28 April 2026

Snapshot

Current portfolio value	£2,008.07
Week 7 portfolio value	£2,025.84
Weekly change	-£17.77 / -0.88%
Starting cost basis	£1,999
Overall result	+£9.07 / +0.45%
Last month move	About +£170 / +9.7%

A cooler week after the recovery

Week 8 was more mixed. The account ended at £2,008.07, down from £2,025.84 the week before. So it was not another push higher, but it also did not undo the recovery. The portfolio was still just above the starting value, which mattered because a few weeks earlier it had been under much more pressure.

The bigger picture was still much better than it had been a month earlier. The account was up roughly £170 over the last month, which was about a 9.7% recovery. So the week was not exciting, but it was useful because the portfolio held most of the recent improvement.

What was still working

The main support was still coming from the growth and technology side. Alphabet, Meta, the Nasdaq ETF, the S&P 500 ETF, ASML, Airbnb and Symbotic were helping keep the account around breakeven or slightly above the original cost base.

Alphabet was becoming one of the stronger positions, which was encouraging because it was meant to be a higher-quality core holding. Meta also still looked strong. Symbotic had recovered well from where it had been earlier, but I still did not want to treat one recovery as proof that the risk had disappeared.

What was annoying me

The main weak spots were Rheinmetall, SGLN, Realty Income and Berkshire. Rheinmetall was the biggest drag from a percentage point of view, and gold was still down despite being one of the largest positions in the portfolio.

Gold was frustrating because it had not helped as much as expected, but I still viewed it as a hedge. Realty Income also remained under pressure, although that still felt more connected to rates and sentiment than to a broken company thesis.

My positioning thoughts

I did not think Week 8 called for a major change by itself. The account was slightly down from Week 7, but still much better than it had been a month earlier. The main thing was to avoid forcing action just because the portfolio had cooled off.

The watchlist for the next week was clear: whether the winners could keep holding the account together, whether the weaker names would stabilise, and whether macro risks around oil, inflation and rates would come back into focus.